For some people, seeing videos about human development can be helpful. National Geographic's In the Womb and this TED talk can be very persuasive.

There are some people that don't see abortion as something that takes life unless they see graphic images of what it does to babies. I think you should warn somebody before showing them, and give them the option of choosing not to view them. I think the best video for this is Stephanie Grey's "Abortion: Before & After" video. It shows both fetal development images and then abortion images from babies that are the same age.

Practical Resources for Highschool and College Students

Casey Vroman from Students for Life of America joins us in studio to talk about the free resources that SFLA offers to college students and now high schoolers. We believe it's important that all pro-life advocates know about these resources so that you can point students in your sphere of influence to them.

Quote of the Month

"Hi Josh, I just wanted to send you an email real quick to say that I recently discovered the podcast, and am going through the old episodes quickly. I really enjoy the arguments you and your guests make and the understanding tone and spirit of dialogue that you try to uphold. I guess that from listening from your podcast I've gone from being "somewhat pro-life, but not really passionate " to being much more active and passionate and activist-oriented about the issue. Keep up the good work!"

I was talking with a Life Report fan recently about one of her family members who claims to be pro-life, but doesn't care very much about abortion. I suspect this is a relatively common thing and can be very confusing for pro-life people who believe that the unborn child is fully human and worthy of legal protection. I offered her four possible explanations why somebody who claims to be "pro-life" may not care about abortion very much. I suspect that you know at least one person that would fall under each of these categories, and I want you to have some tools for engaging each of them.

- 1: She is pro-life, but falsely thinks that all social issues are equal.
- 2: She is pro-life but thinks that other social issues are more important than abortion.
- 3: She only thinks the unborn are semi-valuable, like a golden retriever.
- 4: She believes that while the unborn are fully human, abortion shouldn't be made illegal because of women's bodily autonomy rights.
